

CERTIFICATE IN INTERNATIONAL AND COMPARATIVE LAW

LEVIN COLLEGE OF LAW UNIVERSITY OF FLORIDA

Background Information

Although the term “global economy” has become fairly commonplace, lawyers today realize that globalization involves much more than economics. Every field of law that touches upon commerce, including civil procedure, business associations, securities regulation, intellectual property, trade regulation, taxation, immigration, environmental law, and others, is affected by the globalization process. Equally important is the ever-growing development of human rights laws, both domestically and at the international level. Today’s lawyer is continually challenged by clients and others to become familiar with the laws of foreign jurisdictions and to understand international legal processes.

The Certificate in International and Comparative Law rewards significant academic achievement in the field of international and comparative law. It is awarded by the Levin College of Law to students who have met the requirements stated below. The Certificate is a mark of achievement and a credential for any student who might potentially practice law or be otherwise involved in international matters.

Students enrolled in the Certificate Program have registration priority for program core courses, are given selection priority for student exchanges, summer academic programs in foreign countries and other overseas programs, and are encouraged to attend and to participate in symposia, publications, and programs involving matters of international interest.

The Certificate Program is administered by the International Programs Committee of the Levin College of Law. A faculty member serves as Director of the Certificate Program. All issues regarding Certificate requirements are decided by the Director, subject to review by the International Programs Committee. The Program Assistant for International Programs handles all applications and can assist with any questions or concerns. The International Programs Office is located in 319 Holland Hall.
