LAW 6936	First Amendment Theory Seminar	2	Collier	In the past few years the seminar has, along with my research interests, focused on symbolic speech. First, I ask the students to review the cases we'll read. Then I ask the students to come to the second class with first, second, and maybe even third choices as to which case they would like to be responsible for, which means taking a lead role in its discussion and, at the end of the semester, doing a 15-min oral argument for one side of the case. I try to get "teams" of two students per case, one for each side, in line with their preferences to the extent possible. So the next few weeks are devoted to the discussion of the cases. After that the teams meet with me separately to discuss their oral arguments and their papers (about 20 pages, due at the end of the semester, and having "something to do" with their case). At some point I hand out the Guide for Counsel in Cases To Be Argued Before the Supreme Court of the United States (handout, from the seminar for oral arguments, with the class as the Court. This seems to lend an air of realism to the class, and it has worked well.

Two to three hundred teams from 60-70 countries compete. The course, offered in the Fall, includes three parts. For the first five weeks, students study the Convention on the International Sale of Goods (CISG). These are the rules governing contracts involving parties to contracts who are in different countries and the primary focus of the Moot. At the five week point in early October, the organizers of the Moot release the problem for the 2015 competition. Students, with a partner, write a brief on one side of the case. Finally, students make an oral argument based on the brief. The best 4-6 oralists are selected to represent the Law School in Vienna. This is a 3 credit course and all students passing the course receive 3 credits whether or not they are selected for the team. Forty percent of the final grade is based on a written exam at the end of 5 weeks. Forty percent is based on the brief and 20% is based on the oral argument.
